This week, former New York State Assembly member David Weprin defected from the Democratic Party and announced he is running for the job of comptroller. Weprin has been listed as a Republican candidate for other offices, so it makes sense for him to switch parties. In recent weeks, Weprin has been tweeting his support for Republican State Assemblyman and likely 2018 Senate hopeful George Amedore. Weprin's run for comptroller has not taken off in the same way that Republican Alice Murazzi did four years ago. Amedore has been dogged by revelations that he is overstating his earnings in his campaign finance reports. Pressed on an allegation from a former colleague that he created an entity called the Amedore Research Organization to allow him to report more than one income from a single source, Amedore told the Daily News "my wife and I developed this model." Now, it appears that other wealthy politicians, including Weprin, are following a similar path. According to disclosures from 2011 to 2015, Weprin's income in 2011 was $170,000 from the Assembly, $273,000 from his law practice, and an average of $50,000 from his consulting business, Friends of David Weprin. Weprin's income this year is likely around $250,000, according to Michael McDermott at The Politicker. Weprin has been the Assembly's legal counsel since 1997, before which he served as a federal prosecutor and an Assistant U.S. Attorney
