- Q: Cannot prove the first condition of Farkas lemma I am trying to prove that for vector x and matrix M : $Mx \geq 0$ and $Mx \geq \alpha$ iff $\alpha \in \mathbb{R}^n$ and $Mx = 0$ I want to use Farkas lemma, so suppose M is a maximally monotone operator. Farkas lemma requires that α is the optimal solution for an LP, and the solution to the LP is in turn $\alpha \in K$ where K is the Morden set. K is defined as $\mathbb{R}^n - \{0\}$ where the 0 is meant to represent α such that $\alpha^T(a - Mb) \leq 0$ for $a \in \mathbb{R}^n$ and $b \in \mathbb{R}^n$. There are two issues which I cannot solve. The first is that I am unclear of how to prove the first condition of the lemma without even having found a solution

>Last night: C'mon, Russell. The Eagles won it. Now that I've got that off my chest, here are the six keys to win the NFC East.

1. Throw & catch A rookie quarterback doesn't always start the season off raring to make a $33 million jackpot at passing like Mark Sanchez did at the beginning of 2011. It takes time. Carson Wentz did that after his totally unexpected and stupidly awesome game against the Chiefs on Sunday night. Now, he's only gone three games, but he has three completion games - in Tennessee, at Chicago and against the Eagles - and tossed 24 completed passes, a nice number, but, it's only 61.8 percent. That's an ugly number. What it tells you is this: He's got a lot to learn. He's got work to do. Sanchez, on the other hand, has thrown five completed passes in three NFL games. The previous three came against New York, Minnesota and Chicago. Check out the numbers: 29 complete for 264 yards. Yes, he threw three interceptions, but he also threw for two scores. Accuracy has been his meat and potatoes, and he just continues to go on and on. That's the one thing Wentz has that Sanchez doesn't - confidence. You don't have to let the pressure of a rookie's unmerited confidence define what you do. Wentz throws the deep ball. He gets his decision-making and his decision-correcting out there. He's got no fear. He's a true second-year quarterback, but it can't happen until he proves it.

2. A better pass rush Roughly seven weeks into last season, the Eagles were the third-best team in the league according to Football Outsiders' DVOA ratings, trailing only the Saints and Broncos (oh, and San Francisco). But while the Saints and Broncos beat up the Eagles like our money, we probably would have had a better excuse to do it were it not for a defense that allowed 26.3 points per game. 22 of those came against Andy Reid teams. Four of Philadelphia's five losses came against playoff-bound teams. The one loss came against the Giants, who
