when the original scanned file is malicious and the attack is used to convey to the agent that its benign, its referred to as a silencing attack. the silencing attack is beneficial for attackers who seek to deliver malware while going unnoticed by the anti-malware agent. the silencing attack is depicted in the figure below through an example in which the attacker alters the response of the mcafee estp agent for windows to trick the agent into misclassifying the malicious file as benign. according to a recent post on the adguard blog, the adguard antivirus team is currently monitoring new browser vulnerabilities and this is the reason why you are not seeing the latest security update published last week. the blog post also gives a quick overview about the new threat activity in the wild and points to the sites where you can find the latest security alerts. although the program has been around for years, it has been gaining traction in the last few months. this is because of a clever ploy that has been developed, which involves the use of modern websites to trick the victims into visiting a malicious page. users are lured by the offer of a free download, only to be tricked by another even more nefarious offer. we have received many different submissions in the past, so we thought it would be a great idea to share the latest version of this tool that has been submitted by one of our readers. unfortunately for the victim, the scam continues even after the download has been completed. this is the reason why you should continue reading even if you're an experienced computer user. 5ec8ef588b
